Excerpt: . . . Figure 1 - Hypothetical example showing the assumed relationship between increasing recreational use within wildlife habitats and the probability of focal species persistence and maintenance of ecosystem processes and functions. or low depending largely on the extent of inuence that these activities had on wildlife habitats within a given analysis area. Where possible, we linked these rankings to bio-logical thresholds derived from our literature review. Where these data were lacking, we generally split the effects levels into quartiles to assign relative ranks. The assessment processes and models described in the document were designed to address broad-scale issues, such as cumulative effects, and to provide informa-tion that could be used to evaluate project-level effects. These models could best be viewed as working hypotheses about the interactions between roads, trails, and wildlife. As such, wildlife responses should be monitored and models adapted as new information becomes available. Step 5. Assess the current condition - We applied the assessment processes and models to evaluate the current condition of wildlife habitats for each of the effects of associated factors of the recreation activities ( table 2 ) associated with roads and recreation trails. To complete this assessment, district recreation specialists updated GIS-based road and trail maps and attributed each trail or trail segment with informa-tion on trail use levels. This was completed for all the recreation trails that occurred in the assessment area. Step 6. Identify information gaps - The literature review, model-building exercises, and pilot study allowed for the identification of information...
