Morning Journey to Blythwood--A Cordial Welcome-- Hardships of War--More Kindness--Arrival of the Wagons. We started about seven o clock, and at first the air was very cold; but soon the delicious sunshine appeared to gladden our hearts and cheer us on our way. Of course my mental thermometer rose at least fifty degrees at once, and I was soon enjoying the very beautiful hill-scenery by which we were on all sides surrounded. There were several little streams to cross, and it was pleasant to descend from the buggy and go over the stepping-stones, and I should really have enjoyed the whole thing very much had I not begun to feel excessively nervous about our reception at Blythwood, and I sincerely wished it could still have been my lot to have remained in my home and be in a position to offer,...
