Not illustrated. 1892 Excerpt: . and eight standard squares placed upon it, --these also being taken through the perforated brass. When the plate was developed, we obtained a negative similar to Plate II., Fig. 4. Owing to an accident to the original, this figure had to be reproduced from a second plate, taken during my absence. To this circumstance must be ascribed the error in the orientation, by which the eastern side of the plate is placed at the top, instead of the northern, and the fact that the nebula itself is turned right for left, instead of being represented correctly like the others. In this figure, which is reproduced of the same size as the original, only six of the squares are shown. The general shape of the nebula can be traced in the little bright circles, and it is seen to be similar to that of Plate II., Fig 7, which was taken with the same instrument and exposure, but was subsequently enlarged. Similar perforated pictures were taken with the Draper telescope. This instrument transmits so much light, that the sky, even on the clearest nights, is sufficiently brilliant to darken the film in an hour s exposure, and would thus produce circles all over the plate, interfering more or less with those made by the standard light. As these two sets of circles could not be made to exactly coincide, it was thought best to mask the two ends of the plate with strips of black paper,...
