CHAPTER IX JERRY and Skipper shared the long afternoon-watch together, the latter being guilty of recurrent chuckles and exclamations such as: Gott-fer-dang, Jerry, believe me, you re some fighter and all dog ;or, You re a proper man s dog, you are, a lion dog. I bet the lion don t live that could get your goat. And Jerry, understanding none of the words, with the exception of his own name, nevertheless knew that the sounds made by Skipper were broad of praise and warm of love. And when Skipper stooped and rubbed his ears, or received a rosekiss on extended fingers, or caught him up in his arms, Jerry s heart was nigh to bursting. For what greater ecstasy can be the portion of any creature than that it be loved by a god? This was just precisely Jerry s ecstasy. This...
