Serials Publications, 2008. Hardcover. Book Condition: New. Environment and Development are not the two separate entities but linked together in a complex system of cause and effect. Environmental problems arise as a consequence of lack of development and from unprotected and unintended consequences of economic growth. It is a byproduct of modern development, growth and equity. As per the traditional theory `economic development` refers to a process of economic transformation involving the structural transformation of an economy through industrialization and improvement in the quality of human lives. The recent concept of development refers to sustainable development which not only aims at development but also to protect the environment. The World Commission on Environment and Development Report warned about the problem of industrial waste management challenging us as a society and wanted as much care to be taken for the present and succeeding generations as for those in the distant future. Much of `Human Development` has taken place in terms of provision and enabling better health, education and income opportunities. They act as pressures on various socio-economic and environmental attributes. Examples are with better health provision, expectation of life can improve, per capita income may increase, demand for ground water may increase, forest degradation may take place, solid and medical wastes may increase and so on. Then the impact and outcomes can be improved, worsened or changes the socio-economic welfare and environmental status are important indicators to examine. Governments have failed to cope-up with these challenges. Thus, the environmental concerns have assumed significance. Printed Pages: 438.
